Tribute Wall

“ I spent many hours at this man's home as a child, always being treated as one of the grandkids. Some people seem to occupy such a quietly carved out space, knowing themselves so well that they rarely need to bother anyone else. Bob was such a normal sight in Middlebourne. For me he defined it. Right before I got the news, I stood in the twilight watching two tiny wispy shapes of little girls playing and twirling, waiting for the fireworks. It made me pause, feeling some significance in the moment but unable to name it. A second later I was told he had almost certainly passed. I thought to myself, of course. He was taken in the happiest moment of the year, a right that he earned in this life, as you can see from the smile on his face. Since there is to be no public memorial, this is my act of condolence and memorial. I wonder how many years from now some straight-backed, shuffling, patient, steel-haired grandfather will catch my eye walking across the Witschey's parking lot, and I will be convinced for a second that it is my old friend, before I remember that I myself have grown old, and confused my memories with reality. I will miss the simple sight and knowledge of him for the rest of my days. May peace be upon my little extended family tonight. I am so sorry for your loss.
